Do not be anxious for anything

Many are anxious at this uncertain time. We can take comfort that God is sovereign – he is in control.

We give thanks to God for how he has used the Institute in recent months.

We're delighted that the intrusive Named Person scheme has finally been scrapped – three years after our landmark victory against it in the UK Supreme Court. It gives us great joy to see how we have been able to make a difference for parental freedom, religious liberty and more. Yet so many areas of society are threatened by secular 'progressive' values. We see this in the misguided smacking ban.

We must oppose the moves to undermine parents, liberalise drugs laws and downgrade marriage. It is vital Christians stand firm against the false claims of the transgender lobby. And we must continue to be resolute in championing the sanctity of human life.

Please continue to pray for God's mercy on the nation. Thank you for standing with us.

Great news: Named Persons axed

The Scottish Government has announced it will scrap the intrusive Named Person scheme.

Three years ago the UK Supreme Court ruled unanimously against key elements of the scheme in a case spearheaded by The Christian Institute. However, it was only in September this year that Deputy First Minister John Swinney (pictured) formally agreed to repeal the legislation.

Institute Director Colin Hart said: "We thank God for the news. Parents will be delighted and relieved.

"For years we have said the Named Person scheme is wrong in principle. It is parents, rather than the state, who have the responsibility for raising children.

"Some local authorities in Scotland may continue with something called a 'named person scheme', but it is legally toothless."

Under the original plans, every child in Scotland was to be assigned a 'named "The mandatory Named Person scheme for every child, underpinned by law, will now not happen."

person' – an employee of the state to oversee their 'wellbeing' or 'happiness'.

The Christian Institute launched its legal action against the Children and Young People (Scotland) Act in July 2014. Two years later, Supreme Court judges ruled that the data-sharing provisions in the Act breached the right to a private and family life.

Institute's legal work reaps rewards for street preachers

Christian street preachers in the UK are benefiting from the work of The Christian Institute's legal team.

Last year, Avon and Somerset Police in Bath unlawfully dispersed a group of street preachers including Dale McAlpine. The Christian Institute intervened and this summer Dale and his colleagues found police around the country much more aware of their freedom to share the Gospel.

He said that when police officers approached them in Lincoln, "they spoke to us and listened for a while, left, and we never saw them again". When police were summoned in Bath by hostile passers-by, the officers made sure the preachers were not in any difficulty and upheld their freedom of speech.

The Institute's In-house Solicitor Sam Webster welcomed the change in approach: "Some Christians fear they are no longer able to share the Gospel publicly. This is not the case. I hope they will find the positive experience of Dale and his fellow preachers encouraging."

MSPs ignore public and pass law to criminalise loving parents

Parents in Scotland face criminal charges for smacking their children, after controversial legislation on a ban was backed by Holyrood.

Despite public opposition and warnings of widespread investigations into families, MSPs voted by 84 to 29 in favour of the Bill.

A spokesman for Be Reasonable, the campaign group backed by The Christian Institute. said: "Incredibly. politicians have ignored the overwhelming response of parents, other experts and the wider public who reject this dangerous social experiment."

It is estimated that more than 5,000 parents could be subjected to police investigations in the first five years of the law being in place.

A 2017 ComRes poll of 1,010 Scottish adults found that 74 per cent did not think parental smacking should be criminalised.

Drug deaths at record high

Britain has been branded the 'drug capital of Europe'.

Figures from the Office for National Statistics showed that drug deaths are at record levels.

A separate study, the European Drug Report 2019, also revealed that almost 40 per cent of drug overdose deaths in the EU occurred in the UK.

Drug deaths in England and Wales have increased to their highest level since 1993, while in 2018 Scotland saw 1,187 people die in drug-related cases.

Pro-drugs campaigners are demanding both the decriminalisation of cannabis, and so-called shooting galleries where addicts can be given drugs and inject themselves. So far the Government has resisted the demands.

Pray for those in authority

By Colin Hart, Director

In 1 Timothy 2, believers are urged to pray for "kings and all those in authority, that we may live peaceful and quiet lives in all godliness and holiness". This is not praying for an easy life, but because it "is good, and pleases God our Saviour, who wants all men to be saved and to come to a knowledge of the truth".

Praying for those in authority is about the good of our fellow citizens, and ultimately the salvation of souls and the glory of God. It is a Gospel issue. And it is particularly urgent at the present time.

We should give thanks for the stability and freedom we have enjoyed for many years in the UK. Political turmoil allows wickedness to flourish.

We've already seen terrible action taken under the cover of the current disarray, such as MPs voting to impose same-sex marriage and abortion on Northern Ireland. No-fault divorce, assisted suicide and weaker drug laws could all follow.

Let us pray fervently that they do not.

1 in 4 babies aborted

Nearly a quarter of babies in Great Britain are aborted. Excluding miscarriages, 23.7 per cent of pregnancies were aborted in 2018, official figures show.

It comes as accounts from abortion giant Marie Stopes International reveal UK taxpayers are its biggest funders. In 2018, the UK provided over £48 million of funding.

BBC tells kids there are over 100 'gender identities'

A BBC resource for children aged nine to twelve features a Relationships and Sex Education teacher telling children there are over 100 'gender identities'.

The video, part of a series from BBC Teach, also suggests a child "might be gay" if they like someone of the same sex "in a slightly different way" to other friends.

'Don't rush to affirm trans identity' warn NHS experts

Parents who encourage their children to 'change gender' may be doing more harm than good, NHS experts are warning.

Activist groups such as Mermaids and Stonewall are pushing radical gender ideology to children at ever younger ages.

But the experts say allowing a child to change their name, clothes and pronouns could lead to more serious issues later in life and Portman Trust, which is responsible for the NHS's primary gender identity clinic for children.

She warned that by encouraging their children to 'socially transition', parents may be leading them into greater problems when the child enters puberty and is hit by a "wall of reality".

Dr David Bell also said that children who take hormones or undergo surgery as part of 'transitioning' risk "serious and irreversible damage".

Adult stem cells help blind see and stroke patients recover

Ethical stem cells have been used both to treat sight loss and to dramatically improve the likelihood of recovery for stroke patients.

In recent weeks, a British man left blind in one eye after an acid attack and a partiallyblind woman in Japan both saw improvements after treatment with adult stem cells.

The cells are also being used to help improve the prospects of stroke patients recovering by rejuvenating damaged tissue, a small study has shown.

Reality Check: Hate crime

By Ciarán Kelly, Deputy Director (Staff & Comms)

We hear a lot these days about a rise in 'hate crime'. Yet in reality it may be neither 'hateful' nor 'a crime'.

According to Home Office rules if a 'victim' believes that a crime has occurred, that's "usually sufficient" to justify recording it. So a crime may be recorded when none has been committed.

And then there's the question of 'hate'.

A hate crime is defined as "any criminal offence which is perceived, by the victim or any other person, to be motivated by a hostility or prejudice" based on one of five categories: religion, faith or belief; race, ethnicity or nationality; sexual orientation; disability; or gender identity.

But both the Police and the Crown Prosecution Service note, "There is no legal definition of hostility" so it can be understood to encompass "ill-will, spite, contempt, prejudice, unfriendliness, antagonism, resentment and dislike". So recorded 'hate crimes' will include instances of perceived unfriendliness or dislike.

In short, 'hate crime' may not be motivated by hate and may not even be a crime.

No-fault divorce Bill in the balance

Radical plans to make divorce far quicker and easier in England and Wales hang in the balance.

The Divorce, Dissolution and Separation Bill appeared to be halted when the Westminster Parliament was prorogued in September. The Bill re-emerged when the UK Supreme Court ruled that was unlawful. Its future may now depend on the timing of a General Election.

Under the Bill a husband or wife could walk away from their marriage without giving any reason, and leave their spouse no opportunity to contest the divorce. Proceedings could be rushed through in just six months.

Institute Director Colin Hart branded the Bill, "the most anti-family legislation since the introduction of same-sex marriage".

Institute's 'right to pray' case benefits council 7 years on Councillors in Wales have defied secularists' demands and vowed to keep praying before the start of council meetings.

Denbighshire Council was told its Christian prayers were discriminatory by one of its councillors, who got backing from the National Secular Society (NSS).

The prayers are conducted in the council chamber prior to meetings, but are concluded before any formal business starts and do not breach any laws.

Denbighshire Council refused to bow to pressure, citing a Christian Institute legal case involving Bideford Town Council in 2012.

In that case, the NSS claimed that council prayers discriminated against atheists and breached their human rights.

But the High Court ruled against this central argument, establishing the principle that public bodies need not be secular in order to comply with equality and human rights law.

Three in four say extremism definition is 'unhelpful'

Most people think the Government's definition of extremism is unhelpful, an official consultation has

Over 2,500 members of the public submitted views to the Commission for Countering Extremism with nearly 75 per cent saying the definition was "unhelpful" or "very unhelpful".

"Extremism is the vocal or active opposition to our fundamental values, including democracy, the rule of law, individual liberty and the mutual respect and tolerance of different faiths and beliefs. We also regard calls for the death of members of our armed forces as extremist."
